Actually, this account should bear the title "Moscow, January 1937," for things are moving so quickly in Moscow that many observations lose their truth in a very few months. I met people there who knew their Moscow well, but who hardly recognized their own city when they saw it again after an absence of six months.

The Moscow Trials were a series of show trials held in the Soviet Union at the instigation of Joseph Stalin between 1936 and 1938 against Trotskyists and members of Right Opposition of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. There were three Moscow Trials, including:

Bing: Moscow 1937

The year 1937 is one of immense paradoxes: the glamour of the Moscow Canal, the new metro, skyscrapers, a celebration of the body beautiful, but also that of the disappearance of an increasing number of prisoners into the gulags, the loss of privacy, the unstoppable influx of displaced farmers into the city, and so many disappearances that production of the phone book Vsja Moskva was simply cancelled. Against a backdrop of 'progress' this was also the Moscow of the sinister House on the

The Book Report: Miracle Jones on "Moscow, 1937" - Vol. 1

Moscow 1937 was not only a place of death; it was also a 'gigantic construction site', as Schlögel emphasises in chapter two, and this remains the central contrast which chases the reader through the pages of this book.

Translated from the German, the prose can be a bit clunky, but I really enjoyed the episodic way it described the Moscow of 1937 and the gangster regime that controlled Russia and the other peoples imprisoned in that Gulag of nations.

Moscow, 1937 by Karl Schlogel a book report by Miracle Jones Oh man, the world is a horrible place. It is basically a Megadeth t-shirt made of spiders covering an oozing harvest of boils that are slowly growing digestive organs and that will eventually pop, dropping sharp little vampire teeth, and eating all of us alive.
